In this article, I focus on representations of the experience of migration and settlement across generations and on the ways in which the texts treat questions of identity and belonging. 2 The novels are set in a Britain disfigured by racism and ethnocentrism that had claimed to be the “ Mother of Empire ” and had invited her former colonial subjects in the 1950s and 1960s to come and work. The Britain addressed by these writers is one in which questions of identity and belonging have ...

Yet not everyone in developing countries migrates to developed countries, even when migration would imply a significant income gain for a large majority. Africa, the poorest continent on the globe, has generated relatively small migration flows considering the massive gain that migration would bring to its inhabitants (Hatton and Williamson, 2002).
